The Sky Spies

Small text block below the title, likely providing a brief history or context of the aircraft's role in espionage.

HOW DO THEY GO TO THE BATHROOM IN SPACE?

One of the questions most often asked by children (probably because adults are too embarrassed to ask) is, "How do astronauts go to the bathroom in space?" Displayed here are human waste disposal units—plain and simple, toilets—developed for use aboard Russian spacecraft. They are designed to deal with the unique challenges of carrying humans in small, confined spaces under conditions of weightlessness, combined with the need to contain, and dispose of human wastes.

APOLLO LUNAR SUIT

This space suit was used on the Moon by the Apollo 15 crew in 1971. It was the last of the Apollo lunar suits, and the most advanced. The suit was designed to protect the astronaut from the harsh conditions of the lunar environment, including extreme temperatures, vacuum, and radiation. The suit was also designed to provide the astronaut with life support, including oxygen, water, and carbon dioxide removal. The suit was made of a lightweight material called "beta cloth" and was covered in a thin layer of gold to protect it from solar radiation. The suit was also equipped with a complex life support system, including a small oxygen tank and a carbon dioxide scrubber. The suit was used for a total of 27 hours of lunar surface activity. The suit was also used for the Apollo 16 and Apollo 17 lunar surface activities.
