A night-time photograph of the Tower Bridge in London, illuminated with blue and white lights. The bridge's two massive towers and suspension cables are clearly visible against a dark sky. The bridge spans across the River Thames, with its reflection visible in the water below. The overall scene is a classic representation of London's architectural heritage.

The diagram illustrates the administrative hierarchy of a university. It consists of three vertically aligned rectangular boxes. The top box contains the text 'Chancellor Head of university'. A large downward-pointing arrow connects this box to the middle box, which contains 'Vice-chancellor'. Another large downward-pointing arrow connects the middle box to the bottom box, which contains 'Council'. The background is a light blue gradient with faint horizontal lines.
