Alexander Graham Bell

(born March 3, 1847, Edinburgh, Scotland, died Aug. 2, 1922, Nova Scotia, Canada)

Scottish-born US scientist and inventor. He opened his own school in Boston for training teachers of the deaf (1872). In 1876 he became the first person to transmit intelligible words through electric wire. He patented the telephone the same year, and in 1877 he cofounded Bell Telephone Co. His invention opened a new age in communication technology.

CREATING A NEW LANGUAGE

Millions of messages are not in the form of speech, but in the form of the written word. A growing number of mobile-phone users – especially youths – are using a facility called the Short Message Service (SMS). This service allows them at relatively little expense to type and send brief message to each other. About 30 billion messages are exchanged every month world wide.
