

Music.

The music of primitive people.

There was not present-day music without music of the stone age. The people of the stone age did their own instruments from different things.

Probably, the oldest "music instrument" is human body. The first sounds appeared because of patter or blow on different parts of the body (for example, on bosom or hip).

They used them, for example, for hunting to warn from danger. At the same time these instruments were used as the objects for mutual contact.

Music of the middle ages

The appearance of several voices instead of traditional one voice was a real break in history of the music. For people of that time, the merging of some voices, which met in one tune was something new and unnatural, but the innovation became acclimated and survived till our time.
