UNITS AND SET EXPRESSIONS

Phraseological units

○ are word groups that cannot be made in the process of speech, they exist in the language as ready made units. They are compiled in special dictionaries. The same as words phraseological units express a single notion and are used in a sentence as one part of it.

TIP
TAT

Sometimes only the beginning of a proverb is given, which is enough for the interlocutor since the rest is well-known to him, e.g.:

"What John can see in that horrid man, I can't think". "Birds of a feather... perhaps?" "Perhaps. If he's not careful it'll be a case of "fool and his money...", I'm afraid,

Saying

- 0 Is a short well-known expression — a pithy remark of wisdom and truth or a general advice.
- 0 While a proverb is characterized by the completeness of thought, a saying is not so completely expressed

A balanced diet means a cupcake in each hand.

- o We also has differences between proverbs and maxims, which are non-metaphorical. They are understood literally: Better late than never.
- o Maxim is a synonym of proverb.
- o the difference between maxim and proverb is that maxim is a self-evident axiom; a pithy expression of a general principle or rule while proverb is a phrase expressing a basic truth which may be applied to common situations.

Maxim

- o A short, pithy statement expressing a general truth or rule of conduct.
- o A well-known phrase that expresses a general truth about life or a rule about behavior

The stylistic function of proverbs and sayings is adding an expressive element to speech. To this group of expressive means employed in an artistic text, scholars usually refer numerous other set phrases and idioms.

Idioms/Set phrases

- o An expressions that is peculiar to itself grammatically or cannot be understood from the individual meanings of the words. Quite a few idioms are language specific, and thus difficult to translate.

heart in your mouth (extremely frightened or anxious)

o However their stylistic potential is usually realized not so much by being used in the text in their fixed form, but through their “decomposition”, i.e. breaking them up, or violating their traditional structure.

0 As is known, the components of a phraseological unit have no independent meaning, but make up the meaning of the whole combination. So for stylistic purposes writers may either

- (1) revive the original independent meaning of a word/words in a phrase, which gives that phrase a fresh understanding or significance (this often results in SDs called zeugma and pun)
- (2) attach a continuation to some element of a phraseological unit by means of qualifying it. (the so-called prolongation)

The effect created is either originally fresh, or humorous, or sometimes ridiculous, since the writer, as it were, pretends to understand the phrase literally (i.e. words are used in their primary sense). These are two popular types of intentional violation of set expressions.

1. - He took his leave and hat, (to take one's leave — “say goodbye” vs to take one's hat = “to get it with one's hands”:
the figurative and literal meanings of the verb “to take” are realized simultaneously) (C. Boyle)

2. - He was reported to have his finger in all the backstairs pies

that went on in the Balkans. (A. Christie)

(The idiom “to have a finger in every pie” (to be involved in everything that is happening) is split by the attribute “all the backstairs” and then prolonged and turned into a metaphor.)

0 One more case of violation of set phrases is a deliberate mixing up or transformation of different sayings, proverbs, fixed idiomatic expressions and/or making up so called false phraseological coinages. The aim is to play upon words and achieve a humorous effect.
